Gulf of Mexico

Minibasins

One of the characteristic features of the northern Gulf of Mexico salt province is the many minibasins in the southern part. These minibasins form a province (see map) above allochthonous salt and are depressions between diapirs filled with deep-water sediments.

Because the allochthonous salt has an open toe (free surface) to the south, the salt flows southward when loaded by sediments that sink into the salt and create gradually deepening minibasins.

This restoration to the end of the Pliocene shows how sediments had sunk deep down into the allochthonous salt already at that time. Note that the minibasins (indicated by dark red arrows) are deeper to the north, causing systematic south-directed advancement of salt. Based on Peel et al. (1995).
